The Little Sunflowers Project

In China, an average of nearly 40,000 new childhood cancers are diagnosed each year, with leukaemia being the most common. When a child is diagnosed as having leukaemia, their parents want only the best treatment for them, but what happens when there is limited medical care and drugs available? Medical services have to be paid for in China and many families still live in poverty.

For poor families in Liaoning Province, the shock of learning that their child has a potentially life-limiting illness is made worse by:

- trying to raise funds to pay for treatment
- trying to understand the emotional impact on their child
- getting information so they can provide a supportive environment
- dealing with lack of support and understanding from wider society

The Caritas Social Service Centre in Shenyang in North East China wants to fund a team of three staff who will work with patients, family members, medical and nursing staff and the wider society to:

- provide practical and emotional support for patients and families
- through group activities and workshops increase understanding and decrease isolation
- raise public awareness of childhood leukaemia.
